At the same time somewhere else...

Melik Ohanian, Pia Rönicke, Sean Snyder

Exhibition 17 December 2005 – 19 February 2006

At the same time somewhere else...* is curated by Judith Schwarzbart as the culmination of her one year position as curator/researcher at The Fruitmarket Gallery and Edinburgh College of Art. The exhibition has developed out of her ongoing interest in different working formats in artistic and curatorial practice.

The exhibition brings together work by three international artists who share a methodology that is increasingly prevalent in contemporary art. The artists have in common a way of working which involves investigating materials and situations already existing in the world, and all three seem to be governed by a specific question or curiosity. Their practice takes the form of research, but a kind of research which is free from academic conventions and methods. They plunder a variety of traditions from conceptual art, documentary film-making and independent cinema to the mass media, examining both the evocative and the informative quality of an image.

All three artists are intrigued by images or stories which convey a connection to global structures and represent a personal or oblique point of view. They also share an interest in places and issues of representation, identity and urban structures. Their work is often an unpredictable journey, which takes surprisingly new directions along the way, while the material they use offers the viewer an opportunity for speculative inquiry.

Based across Europe and addressing various topics, these artists are united by an interest in the complex relationship between our notion of reality and storytelling, where fictive stories sometimes say a lot about reality while it can be hard to discern the truth conveyed by documentary photographs.

Sean Snyder's work is an extended research into the imagery and reporting of war. The intention is not to comment on political issues, but to investigate the representational modes of events that are consumed second hand. In a sense the attempt is to take the news seriously as something that conveys information and refers back to a reality beyond the television screen and printed page. In doing so, it attempts to reveal some fundamental questions of representation.

There are three related parts. Untitled (Iraq) 2003-05 is an ongoing archive of digital amateur photos produced by military forces and contractors excavated from photo file-sharing sites on the Internet. As such it exposes a layer of what would normally remain largely unseen images. Overt images of war and violence are excluded in favour of the banal subjects of amateur photographers. The images present a perspective different from that of the embedded reporter and evoke notions of tourist, classical and criminal photography.

The Site 2004-2005 uses a matrix of images and reports produced by western news agencies about the location in which Saddam Hussein was captured. Overlapping accounts and visual evidence are used to produce a similar, but inconsistent depiction of a location and incident that is restricted and no longer exists in reality. The analysis is not conspiratorial, but rather about accessibility, timing and the relation of reporters to their subject. For instance, it is interesting to note the media's particular focus on western consumer items like candy bars, processed meat and deodorant.

The video Casio, Seiko, Sheraton, Toyota, Mars 2004-2005 examines the acceptance of consumer products on all sides of ideological divides and the transforming role of photojournalists given the availability of consumer digital imaging products. Using imagery from amateur sources and from media agencies like the Associated Press, conventions and complications of producing an iconic image of war are explored through concepts such as the history of staging, digital manipulation of images, the news viewer as consumer and the photojournalist as looter.

Melik Ohanian works in various media and with various topics, always allowing the audience a space for intervention either directly or on an imaginative level.

His new work Invisible Film is a poetic film with a violent undertone. In the Californian desert, El Mirage, Ohanian has projected British filmmaker Peter Watkins' film Punishment Park onto the location in which it was shot in 1971. Both controversial and relentless in its depiction of suppression and brutality, Punishment Park was heavily attacked by the mainstream press when it was released. Set in a detention camp in an America of the near future, the film in a pseudo-documentary manner portrays a group of young students and minor dissidents who have opted to spend three days in 'Bear Mountain Punishment Park'. The detainees, rather than accept lengthy jail sentences for their 'crimes', gamble their freedom on an attempt to reach an American flag, on foot and without water, through the searing heat of the desert. Ohanian's re-staging of the source material from Punishment Park plays with the reality of the projector and the fiction of the film, while the story of the film today is closer to reality today than could have been imagined when it was made.

Ohanian's Slowmotion offers visitors the opportunity to intervene in the work by changing the words displayed. The artist invites the viewer to programme his pre-historical computing machine with different letters, words or symbols, which are displayed on the light boards. The five panels are connected to a switchboard, which can be controlled by the viewer. Anyone who programmes the machine is asked to record by numerical transposition the code for each display in the small notepad provided. The artist describes Slowmotion as a kind of seismography, detecting and measuring the mood and atmosphere of a given place.

Pia Rönicke mixes recorded film and sound with drawings and animations, which visually confront ideas with the lived reality of human life and different architectural and urbanist ideologies. In Cell City, 2003, she contemplates the endless possibilities of modern architecture as a means of framing multiple ways of living, while also addressing the remoteness of idealism and current urban planning schemes.

In Urban Fiction the protagonist 'the urban subject' moves through the city, while performing a 'dialogue' between two of the twentieth century's most radical urban thinkers, the French architect Le Corbusier (1887–1965) and the Belgian artist Constant (1920–2005). Le Corbusier believed in a functional and rationally organised city where work, leisure and living all had their allocated space, whereas Constant believed in a dynamic city without divisions. Le Corbusier prioritised skyscrapers and suburbs and Constant preferred free movement, play and social space. Both posters and film are a kind of storyboard, and on a formal level are inspired by Jean Luc Godard's film Masculine/Feminine (1966).

Pia Rönicke also presents her newest work Zonen (The Zone), a video shot in the outskirts of the Danish city Aarhus, in a so-called 'development zone'. The protagonists are a firm of architects who have recently won a planning competition for a vast housing complex for the area. Rönicke has invited the architects away from their drawing tables into the reality of the countryside which stands in contrast to their conversation and ideas about urban development. The Zone takes its cinematic inspiration from Andrei Tarkovsky's film, Stalker, 1979.

All works in the exhibition are bound together by a play with, on the one hand, the notion of information, which is always true or false, and storytelling, which draws the audience (viewer, listener, reader) into an imaginative universe where it is up to him or her to make sense of the story.
